the United States Department of Agriculture and Food and Nutrition Services The SNAP Ed program in Michigan is administered by the Michigan Fitness Foundation Although evaluation of the SNAP Ed program has always been lauded and held to a high standard clear instructions regarding how the SNAP Ed training programs should be evaluated is lacking This dissertation attempts to use a contemporary training program evaluation theory the New World Kirkpatrick Model which is being promoted in the evaluation field The applicability of the New World Kirkpatrick Model as a framework to evaluate the MFF s Regional Training program is explored throughout this dissertation A mixed method approach has been employed to complete this study In particular a web based survey and three online focus groups were administered to collect data needed to adequately answer research questions proposed in this study The findings show that the New World Kirkpatrick Model is an effective approach to evaluate the Regional Training program at MFF Eight themes that can further inform the planning and delivery of the training program were identified from the qualitative data This study also investigated the correlation among four levels reaction learning behavior and results of the New World Kirkpatrick Model and the findings indicated that there is a positive correlation among these four levels of the model These results provide further evidence that the outcome of the training program does not differ by participant s demographic characteristics such as gender age race level of education or experience Overall this study has significance as it proposes a sound training program evaluation approach that can assist MFF to make informed decisions on revising and improving the current training programs Moreover this dissertation contributes to the evaluation field by demonstrating the effectiveness and limitations of the New World Kirkpatrick Model as an evaluation tool in the nutrition field by providing a comprehensive example of training program evaluation

The American Customer Satisfaction Index Report in 2015 indicated that service quality in the healthcare sector has declined even though the demand for healthcare service is rising Companies invest billions of dollars annually to develop and implement customer service training programs however although companies evaluate their programs in order to continuously improve customer satisfaction service quality is still on the decline This may be because the evaluation process is neither formal nor comprehensive Although the literature indicates that companies carry out evaluations little is known about the actual evaluation process that is utilized to evaluate training programs the levels at which the customer service training programs are evaluated and how the evaluation results findings are used This multi site qualitative case study investigated how two companies in the healthcare sector of the service industry evaluate their customer service training programs in order to propose a solution to ultimately improve service quality The research questions focused on 1 how customer service training programs were evaluated at these two institutions 2 how the evaluation findings were utilized 3 the extent to which the training programs were evaluated according to the New World Kirkpatrick Model and 4 the barriers to evaluating both programs using the four levels outlined in the New World Kirkpatrick Model This study was guided using the theoretical framework outlined in the New World Kirkpatrick Model Data were collected using a qualitative approach which included document review observation and interviews with stakeholders such as training managers trainers quality assurance managers supervisors lead analysts pod trainers and trainees The data were analyzed using within case and cross case analysis The major finding from this study was that although both companies utilized an informal evaluation process they did indeed address three of the four levels outlined in the New World Kirkpatrick Model However the study clearly revealed that there is need for a formal professional evaluation approach and improvement in the manner in which Levels 1 through 3 are conducted and incorporation of Level 4 into the evaluation approach The results of this study will therefore be beneficial to training and quality professionals in the healthcare industry
