Economic Behavior and Rationality

In Chapter 1, we defined economic actors as economic agents, or people or organizations engaged in one or the other economic activities: production, distribution, exchange, consumption, and resource allocation. Economic actors can be individuals, small groups (such as a family or a group of entrepreneurs), or large organizations such as a government agency or a multinational corporation. Economists in effect have their activity defined and approved as they engage in economic activities. In this chapter we explore the behavior of individual economic actors—people. We look at contemporary research on their beliefs, and, where appropriate, compare this with older approaches.

1. Economic Unconsciousness or Mental Mechanisms

Economists have long believed that all people and all acts are rationally calculated in terms of one's needs and values, one's well-being. I therefore, all economic behavior is human behavior. Sometimes economists disagree as to whether or not the rationality of some human actions is apparent—many feel it just looks rational or only sometimes economic, one will find that they are otherwise determined by human desires or feelings. The unconscious has traditionally stood on a standing point, more kind of rational about the economic behavior economic actors.

1.1 Classical Economic Views of Mental Processes

In Chapter 2, we reviewed Adam Smith's concept of the invisible hand, according to which people acting in their own self-interest would, through markets, promote the greatest well-being. The concept of the invisible hand has become very famous, and it is often taken out of context to mean that if people only follow their self-interest, they will do what is best for the world economy.

This interpretation would have surprised Smith, who, before writing his famous Wealth of Nations and The Theory of Moral Sentiments, he wrote the Essays on Sentiments with more focus on the moral aspects of the invisible hand. In the Essays on Sentiments, he writes that people will engage in the pursuit of virtue, the pursuit that each might depend on people acting honestly, justly, and with concern and sympathy for others in their community. Smith recognizes that while there may be a large part of human behavior that he felt is likely to be driven by the "great passions" (the economic desire for self-interest and the pursuit of others) and also by the "humanity" which he felt is the "great virtue" (which will not "pursue the public interest").

Thus Smith's version of human nature and human motivation was not to which individual self-interest was mixed with many social desires. Rather than starting with Wealth of Nations, which focused almost exclusively on the pursuit of self-interest, he perceived that the behavior of self-interest always had to be understood within the person's moral context.
