Basic science and clinical pain research is particularly challenging for several reasons First pain is a subjective experience in response to nociception that follows actual or potential tissue damage Since the ability to respond to this warning signal is essential for our survival the nociceptive system that produces and transmits nociceptive signals is remarkably redundant and involves diffuse regions of the central nervous system Second unlike other sensory modalities pain is a multi dimensional experience including at least cognitive affective and sensory discriminative components Third pain experiences can be influenced by psychological socioeconomic cultural and genetic predispositions making it exceedingly complicated to study pain and pain modulation The topics covered in this volume are carefully selected and directly related to the daily practice of pain medicine These topics include 1 central mechanisms of pain and pain modulation Dickenson Donovan Rodriguez Mattews and clinical use of ion channel blockers Chen 2 spinal glutamatergic mechanisms Guo Dubner Ren and issues related to glutamate receptor antagonists in pain management Mao 3 basic science of opioid analgesics Gintzler Chakrabarti and clinical opioid use Smith McCleane 4 inflammatory cytokines Samad and clinical use of anti inflammatory drugs Fink Brenner 5 role of the sympathetic nervous system in pain mechanisms and its relation to clinical pain management Sharma Raja 6 preclinical studies on tricyclic antidepressants Gerner Wang and clinical use of antidepressants in pain management Greenberg 7 developing pain pathways and analgesic mechanisms during the developmental stage Fitzgerald and challenges of pediatric pain management Lebel 8 basic science mechanisms of serotonin agonists and their use in the clinical management of migraine headache Biondi 9 clinical research on gender differences in clinical pain and their implications for clinical pain management Holdcroft 10 current modalities of clinical cancer pain management Popescu Hord and 11 preclinical and clinical information on alternative medicine Chen Energy Tapping Fred P.
