
CHAPTER 15

Study Overview

- Purpose: Gather extensive data from undergraduate students.
- Method: Conducted life-history interviews with nearly 200 participants, all videotaped.

Interview Approach

- Initial Question: Presented unexpectedly to gauge spontaneous responses.
- Participant Reactions:
 - Some provided basic details such as name, hometown, and major.
 - Others shared their favorite activities or life goals.
 - The most frequent initial reaction was a look of panic followed by hesitant responses like "um . . . er . . . well . . ."

Key Insight

- Self-Understanding Challenge: Despite assumptions, many find it surprisingly difficult to articulate a concise self-description when asked without preparation.

THE "I" AND THE "ME"

Conceptualizing the Self

- Source: William James (1890) identified two aspects of self: the "I" and the "me."

Definitions

- The Me: Described as an observable object, the "me" is the epistemological self, encompassing traits and factual descriptors (e.g., "I am friendly," "I am 6 feet tall").
- The I: Known as the ontological self, the "I" is the experiencing entity within, akin to a homunculus or soul. It's involved in decision making and experiencing life.

Challenges in Self-Understanding

- Difficulty in Description: Describing the "I" is challenging because it involves introspection about deep, often inarticulable feelings related to one's traits and decisions.
- Example by Ernest Hilgard (1949): Illustrates the confusion in self-perception using the metaphor of infinite reflections between two mirrors, highlighting the complexity of discerning the observer ("I") from the observed ("me").
