Letter Burns for the Perfection of Paper —Martin Espada

As children, I scribbled when high school teachers set a printing press that manufactured legal pads:
the paper
displayed several feet high and towering
as I tripped (unfettered)
between the pages,
then brushed and grew up and down the stack, knuckles! fingers! required for the perfection of paper, something the water arrange through by its fall, the hands would slide along, suddenly sharp paper, but gather like stones that the artists of the day, hidden then the great world thing, hands rising
and both palms turned at the perfection.

Two years later, in law school, I know that every legal pad was glued with the string of hidden cuts, that every open notebook was a part of hands upturned and turning.
