

11. A manufacturer produces a fixed number of products. From past experience, the manufacturer knows that approximately 2% are defective. In a quality control procedure, the manufacturer takes 100 samples randomly. The goal is to estimate the probability that at least one of these samples is defective.

Let  $X$  be the number of defective products in a particular sample from the random variable  $X$ . What are the assumptions?

12. The following table represents the monthly sales of the company in dollars.

13. Given the probability density function  $f(x)$  for a continuous random variable  $X$ .

14. Given the probability density function of the random variable  $X$  (normally distributed) as shown below, find the mean and standard deviation of  $X$ .

15. Given a set of data representing the number of people who visit the mall and within the mall within the state. To test the normality of the data, you draw a sample of the data and construct a normal distribution curve. The data is as follows:
