Chun Chang,2009 Despite the theoretical attractiveness of the tradeoff theories of corporate capital structure many of their main predictions still lack empirical support For example the existing empirical studies have consistently found a negative relationship between financial leverage ratios and cash flow or profitability ratios This negative relationship is viewed as strong evidence against the tradeoff theories Myers 1990 Rather than using the quot stockquot approach of the previous studies this paper uses a quot flowquot approach designed to capture more precisely the implication of the tradeoff theories We find that for most firms the amount of debt due in a period and the level of cash flow expected in that period are positively related This evidence is consistent with several major tradeoff theories It also provides support for the conventional wisdom that debt payments and cash flows should be matched
