It begins with the transcription of DNA into messenger RNA (mRNA) in the nucleus. This process is regulated by transcription factors, which are proteins that bind to specific DNA sequences and control the rate of transcription. The mRNA then moves to the cytoplasm, where it is translated into a protein by ribosomes. This process is also regulated by various factors, including microRNAs, which can bind to the mRNA and prevent it from being translated. The final protein product can then perform a variety of functions in the cell, depending on the specific gene and the conditions of the environment.  Answer the questions below for each question. 51.
