Compliance V. Culture Patricia J. Harned, 2007 Perspectives of Chief Ethics and Compliance Officers on the Detection and Prevention of Corporate Misdeeds Michael D. Greenberg, 2009

Improvements in corporate compliance ethics and oversight have been a significant policy goal for the U S government at least since the enactment of the U S Federal Sentencing Guidelines in 1991 and the Sarbanes Oxley Act in 2002. Notwithstanding these earlier government initiatives the collapse of financial markets in late 2008 has invited renewed questions about the governance compliance and ethics practices of firms throughout the U S economy. On March 5 2009 RAND convened a conference in Washington D C on the role and perspectives of corporate chief ethics and compliance officers CECOs in supporting organizations in the detection and prevention of corporate misdeeds. The conference brought together leaders from among ethics and compliance officers in the corporate community as well as stakeholders in the nonprofit sector academia and government. Discussions focused on the challenges facing corporate ethics and compliance programs as a first line of defense against malfeasance and misbehavior on the role of CECOs as champions for implementation in their companies and on potential steps that might be taken by government to empower CECOs and by extension the corporate ethics and compliance programs that they oversee.
