Chinese Housing Market Sentiment Index Kaiji Chen,Mr. Yunhui Zhao,2024-12-23 We construct a daily Chinese Housing Market Sentiment Index by applying GPT 4o to Chinese news articles Our method outperforms traditional models in several validation tests including a test based on a suite of machine learning models Applying this index to household level data we find that after monetary easing an important group of homebuyers who have a college degree and are aged between 30 and 50 in cities with more optimistic housing sentiment have lower responses in non housing consumption whereas for homebuyers in other age education groups such a pattern does not exist This suggests that current monetary easing might be more effective in boosting non housing consumption than in the past for China due to weaker crowding out effects from pessimistic housing sentiment The paper also highlights the need for complementary structural reforms to enhance monetary policy transmission in China a lesson relevant for other similar countries Methodologically it offers a tool for monitoring housing sentiment and lays out some principles for applying generative AI models adaptable to other studies globally
