

CHAPTER 6.0

GROUNDWATER INVESTIGATIONS

6.1 GENERAL

Groundwater conditions and the potential for groundwater seepage are fundamental factors in virtually all geotechnical analyses and design studies. Accordingly, the evaluation of groundwater conditions is a basic element of almost all geotechnical investigation programs. Groundwater investigations are of two types as follows:

Determination of groundwater levels and pressures and
Measurement of the permeability of the subsurface materials.

Determination of groundwater levels and pressures includes measurements of the elevation of the groundwater surface or water table and its variation with the season of the year; the location of perched water tables; the location of aquifers (geological units which yield economically significant amounts of water to a well); and the presence of artesian pressures. Water levels and pressures may be measured in existing wells, in boreholes and in specially-installed observation wells. Piezometers are used where the measurement of the ground water pressures are specifically required (i.e. to determine excess hydrostatic pressures, or the progress of primary consolidation).

Determination of the permeability of soil or rock strata is needed in connection with surface water and groundwater studies involving seepage through earth dams, yield of wells, infiltration, excavations and basements, construction dewatering, contaminant migration from hazardous waste spills, landfill assessment, and other problems involving flow. Permeability is determined by means of various types of seepage, pressure, pumping, and flow tests.

6.2 DETERMINATION OF GROUNDWATER LEVELS AND PRESSURES

Observations of the groundwater level and pressure are an important part of all geotechnical explorations, and the identification of groundwater conditions should receive the same level of care given to soil descriptions and samples. Measurements of water entry during drilling and measurements of the groundwater level at least once following drilling should be considered a minimum effort to obtain water level data, unless alternate methods, such as installation of observation wells, are defined by the geotechnical engineer. Detailed information regarding groundwater observations can be obtained from ASTM D 4750, "Standard Test Method For Determining Subsurface Liquid Levels in a Borehole or Monitoring Well" and ASTM D 5092 "Design and Installation of Groundwater Wells in Aquifers".

6.2.1 Information on Existing Wells

Many states require the drillers of water wells to file logs of the wells. These are good sources of information of the materials encountered and water levels recorded during well installation. The well owners, both public and private, may have records of the water levels after installation which may provide extensive information on fluctuations of the water level. This information may be available at state agencies regulating the drilling and installation of water wells, such as the Department of Transportation, the Department of Natural Resources, State Geologist, Hydrology Departments, and Division of Water Resources.
