Channel Catfish

Life History and Biology

Thomas L. Wellborn*

Channel catfish, Ictalurus punctatus (Rafinesque), is the most important species of aquatic animal commercially cultured in the United States. It belongs to the family Ictaluridae, order Siluriformes. Members of the order Siluriformes are found in fresh and salt water worldwide. There are at least 39 species of catfish in North America, but only six have been cultured or have potential for commercial production. They are the blue catfish, Ictalurus furcatus (LeSueur); the white catfish, Ictalurus catus (Linnaeus); the black bullhead, Ictalurus melas (Rafinesque); the brown bullhead, Ictalurus nebulosus (LeSueur); the yellow bullhead, Ictalurus natalis (LeSueur); and the flathead catfish, Pylodictis olivaris (Rafinesque).

Distribution

Channel catfish were originally found only in the Gulf States and the Mississippi Valley north to the prairie provinces of Canada and Mexico, but were not found in the Atlantic coastal plain or west of the Rocky Mountains. Since then channel catfish have been widely introduced throughout the United States and the world.

Physical characteristics

Like all native North American catfishes, a channel catfish has a body that is cylindrical in cross-section, and lacks scales. Fins are soft-rayed except for the dorsal and pectoral fins which have sharp, hard spines that can inflict a nasty, painful wound if a catfish is handled carelessly. An adipose fin (lacking rays) is located on the back between the dorsal and caudal fins (Fig. 1). One conspicuous characteristic of all catfish is the presence of barbels around the mouth. The barbels are arranged in a definite pattern with four under the jaw and one on each tip of the maxilla (upper jaw).

The channel catfish is the only spotted North American catfish with a deeply forked tail. There are 24-29 rays in the anal fin. They are generally olivaceous to blue on the back, shading to the off-white ventrally.
