
Inventory Theory

"Where are you out of the loop?" How often have you heard the phrase during a meeting? In terms of these issues, what you have experienced are those that aren't doing a very good job of managing their inventory—stocks of goods being held for future use or sale. They aren't placing orders to replenish inventory fast enough to avoid shortages. Their stock levels aren't right; they are kinds of challenges of scientific inventory management that are discussed in this chapter.

It isn't just retail stores that have average inventories. In fact, inventories pervade the business world. Manufacturing inventories are necessary for any company dealing with physical products, including manufacturers, wholesalers, and retailers. For strategic manufacturers, stock inventories of the materials required to make their products. They also need inventories of the finished products awaiting shipment. Finally, both wholesaler and retailer need to maintain inventories of goods to be available for purchase by customers.

The total value of all inventory—including finished goods, partially finished goods, and raw materials—in the United States is more than a trillion dollars. This is more than $1000 each for every man, woman, and child in the country.

The issue associated with using ("managing") inventory are also very large, perhaps a quarter of the value of the inventory. Therefore, the issues being treated in the course of inventory in the United States are just the thousands of billions of dollars annually. The theory course ends by providing a somewhat deeper introduction and reference on these topics.

Third, significant companies have production in manufacturing, the just-in-time inventory are also a system that emphasizes planning, and scheduling so that the needed materials arrive "just in time" for their use. Major savings are usually achieved by reducing inventory levels to a few millions.

Many companies in other parts of the world also have been embracing the way to reduce they manage their inventories. The application of operations research techniques to the area (sometimes called scientific inventory management) is providing a powerful tool for getting a competitive edge.
