The Meridian System and Angular Measurement

Angles and distances have had their uses since the dawn of time. In ancient Egypt, the Nile River was used as a natural highway for the transport of heavy loads. The Egyptians had to find a way to measure the length of the river and the distance between the various points of interest. The solution was to use a system of angles and distances. The Nile River was divided into sections, and the distance between the sections was measured. The total distance was then the sum of the distances between the sections. This system was used to measure the length of the Nile River and the distance between the various points of interest. The system was also used to measure the distance between the various points of interest. The system was also used to measure the distance between the various points of interest.
