Capital Structure And Dividend Policy:

Does Corporate Performance Determine Capital Structure and Dividend Policy? Michael W. Faulkender, 2006 We present an integrated theory of capital structure and dividend policy in which both financial policy choices are driven by the same underlying factors and jointly determined as implicit governance mechanisms to allocate control over real project choice decisions between managers and investors At one extreme is a very highly levered firm with very little equity Such a firm puts the maximum control over project choice in the hands of investors At the other extreme is an all equity firm that pays no dividends Such a firm puts maximum control in the hands of the manager Between these two extremes is a continuum of control allocations determined by different debt equity ratios and different dividend payout ratios Higher debt equity ratios and higher dividend payouts lead to greater investor control Despite the absence of agency or asymmetric information problems control matters because of a divergence of beliefs between the manager and investors that could lead to disagreement over the value maximizing project choice The extent of the potential disagreement depends upon the firm's prior performance The manager sets the firm's dividend policy and capital structure to optimally trade off the value he attaches to being in control of project choice against the decline in stock price from taking control away from investors We generate testable predictions from the theory and then test them empirically These tests provide strong support for the theory

Corporate Financial Structure And Value Of The Firm Dr. M.c.t. Shanmugapriya Dr. C. Vethirajan, Capital Structure and Dividend Policy: Evidence from Emerging Markets, This thesis aims to add empirical evidence to the corporate finance literature by looking at two main financing issues namely firms payout policies and capital structure decisions in the context of emerging markets The thesis consists of seven chapters including five main standalone research papers After an introductory chapter the first research paper reviews the existing literature on the dividend policy controversy with an emphasis on recent empirical work The following two chapters consist of two research papers which look separately at the dividend and capital structure decisions of firms in India and in Mauritius In the second research paper an agency model of dividend policy is estimated and tested on a sample of Indian firms using Weighted Least Squares methodology The third research paper applies panel data procedures to estimate and test a model of the determinants of leverage using the entire population of non financial quoted firms in Mauritius The last two empirical papers investigate how affiliation with an Indian

Business House impacts on the dividend and capital structure decisions of firms The impact of group affiliation on the payout decision is tested by Maximum Likelihood qualitative and limited dependent variable techniques The analysis of the impact of group affiliation on the capital structure decision is conducted using Ordinary Least Squares methods and incorporates group level characteristics as explanatory variables While the main findings of these papers are on the whole consistent with the theory there are new major insights that represent the special case of emerging markets These main insights as well as the main conclusions of the study are summarised in Chapter 7 including some promising ideas for future research
