

Computing Discounts Activity

Context

When purchasing items, it is often not clear how much the total price will be after discounts. For example, suppose a $100 item is discounted 10% and then 20% off the total price. One common mistake is to subtract the second discount from the original price. Alternatively, one can subtract the second discount from the price after the first discount. The correct method is to subtract the second discount from the price after the first discount. The correct method is to subtract the second discount from the price after the first discount.

Suppose a $100 item is discounted 10% and then 20% off the total price.

Let x be the price of the item after the first discount.

Write an equation for x and solve for x .

Write an equation for the price after the second discount.

Write an equation for the price after the second discount.

Item	Price	Discount	Final Price
Apple	$100.00	10%	$90.00
Banana	$100.00	20%	$80.00
Orange	$100.00	10%	$90.00
Pineapple	$100.00	20%	$80.00
Watermelon	$100.00	10%	$90.00
Strawberry	$100.00	20%	$80.00

As the discounts are applied, the total price of the items will decrease. Suppose you have a $100 item and you apply a 10% discount. The price is now $90. If you then apply a 20% discount to the $90, the price is now $72. This is the correct method for applying successive discounts.

- Write an equation for the price after the first discount. Let x be the price after the first discount. The equation is $x = 100 - 0.10(100)$.
- Write an equation for the price after the second discount. Let y be the price after the second discount. The equation is $y = x - 0.20(x)$.
- Write an equation for the price after the second discount. Let z be the price after the second discount. The equation is $z = 100 - 0.10(100) - 0.20(90)$.
- Write an equation for the price after the second discount. Let w be the price after the second discount. The equation is $w = 100 - 0.10(100) - 0.20(90)$.
