At first, Brian struggles. He's hungry, scared, and doesn't know what to do. He tries to eat berries he finds in the bushes, but some make him sick. Over time, though, he begins to observe animals and nature carefully, learning what's safe to eat and how to make a shelter to protect himself from wind and rain.

By the end of Hatchet, Brian has changed completely. He has learned to stay calm, think carefully, and respect nature. The wilderness has taught him courage, patience, and independence. Even after he returns home, he never forgets what he learned from his time alone with his hatchet in the wild.

Hatchet is an exciting survival story about a 13-year-old boy named Brian Robeson. At the start of the novel, Brian is traveling by a small bush plane to visit his father, who works in the oil fields of Canada. His parents are divorced, and he feels sad and confused because he knows a secret about his mother that he can't tell anyone.

Using a homemade raft, Brian paddles out to the plane and manages to climb inside through a broken window. It's dangerous work, and he almost gets trapped underwater. Inside, he finds a survival pack that contains food, a sleeping bag, a fishing kit, and—most importantly—a small emergency transmitter.

With fire, Brian feels safer and warmer. He learns to cook fish, scare off animals, and keep bugs away. He becomes proud of his growing survival skills. Over time, he starts to feel like a part of the wilderness, paying attention to every sound, movement, and change in the forest around him.
