

METHODS OF IRRIGATION

CHAPTER

1

Definition of Irrigation

Irrigation may be defined as the science of artificial application of water to the land, in accordance with the 'crop requirements' throughout the 'crop period' for full-fledged nourishment of the crops.

Following are the factors which govern the importance of irrigation

- Insufficient rainfall
- Uneven distribution of rainfall
- Improvement of perennial crops
- Development of agriculture in desert area

Advantages of irrigation

- Increase in food production
- Optimum benefits
- Elimination of mixed cropping
- Improvement of cash crops
- Source of revenue
- General prosperity
- Generation of hydroelectric power
- Domestic water supply
- Facilities of communications
- Inland navigation
- Afforestation

Disadvantages of irrigation

- Rising of water table: water-logging
- Problem of water pollution (nitrates seepage into GW)
- Formation of marshy land
- Dampness in weather
- Loss of valuable lands

Types of Irrigation

- Surface irrigation
- Sub-surface irrigation

Surface irrigation

In the surface methods of irrigation, water is applied directly to the soil surface from a channel located at the upper reach of the field. Water may be distributed to the crops in border strips, check basins or furrows. Two general requirements of prime importance to obtain high efficiency in surface methods of irrigation are: distribution systems to provide adequate control of water to the fields and proper land preparation to permit uniform distribution of water over the field. They are also designed to minimize labor and capital requirements. Effective management practices are dependent on the type of irrigation, and the climate and topography of the region.
