

WRITING LITERARY ARGUMENTS

Most of the research skills should transfer to your argument. And as you write, you may find new ideas. But usually, you might discover them as you really prove or analyze the issues and/or new observations you plan. Often, if the reader knows the issue first, you can write a clear, strong, and brief thesis statement. Then, as you take a position, you'll naturally begin to support it. Always make your thesis clear. The more concrete the argumentative issue, the more likely readers will be convinced you're right and your case is strong.

When you take a literary position, you follow the same process, but the issue is more complex and it takes longer. However, because the issues of literature are more complex, readers need to know more about the argument to persuade them.

Planning a Literary Argument

Choosing a Debatable Topic

Arguments are possible with most topics, especially a position. However, not all topics are debatable. Some topics will be too obvious, such as "Should we abolish slavery?" or "Should we abolish the death penalty?" In most cases, a debatable topic can draw at least two reasonable people to disagree. The next step is to choose a position about which reasonable people do not disagree. An effective argument requires a topic that disagrees.

- Topic Statement: Should we abolish slavery? (This is a debatable topic.)
Slavery is wrong. (This is not a debatable topic.)
- Debatable Topic: Should we abolish slavery? (This is a debatable topic.)
Slavery is wrong. (This is not a debatable topic.)

An effective literary argument will focus on a debatable issue that you can argue about. It will also focus on a position that you can argue about.
