Love it or hate it, AI is blooming in offices across the world. Unless those offices are full of employees working for the U.S. federal government. A new report from Fedcoop casts doubt on Washington's ability to keep up with the times. According to its analysis of multiple federal agencies, D.C. doesn't have the funds or the talent to train to keep up with AI.

Last year, President Joe Biden watched Mission Impossible—Dead Reckoning Part One and got freaked out about AI. It scared him so bad that he signed an executive order that called on tech companies to develop the tech responsibly. The White House also called on federal agencies to issue reports that would detail how they plan to use AI, their plans to mitigate risks against humanity, and to elaborate on what barriers stood in the way of mass adoption of AI.

The White House wanted these reports posted publicly by September. Most of the federal agencies replied and Fedcoop has collected them all in one place and found a common theme. According to Fedcoop, twenty-nine agencies submitted reports. A dozen of them mentioned data hurdles, six mentioned a lack of AI-trained employees, and six said that a lack of funding was hurting their AI initiatives.
