Jonathan Haidt Reflection on The Anxious Generation McNary Kurt, 2026-02-13 In the early 2010s something changed Rates of anxiety depression sleep disruption and emotional overwhelm began rising sharply among young people Parents felt it at home Teachers saw it in classrooms Teens felt it in their own bodies restless exhausted constantly on edge Drawing from research in psychology neuroscience sleep science and adolescent development this book examines how modern life quietly rewired the stress systems of children and teens It explains how constant digital stimulation social comparison sleep loss overprotection reduced independence and the disappearance of unstructured play have created a generation living in stress without recovery But this is not a book about blame It does not demonize technology It does not shame parents It does not label kids as fragile Instead it offers a clear and compassionate framework anxiety is often a stress and recovery imbalance When the nervous system is constantly activated and rarely allowed to reset distress becomes predictable Through twenty practical chapters McNary shows Why anxiety surged after 2010 How always on digital life fragments attention and disrupts sleep Why girls and boys often show different stress patterns How avoidance and reassurance reinforce fear Why overprotection can unintentionally increase anxiety How the loss of independence boredom and real world feedback weakened resilience What families can do starting now to rebuild confidence and emotional strength Most importantly the book provides realistic step by step strategies for restoring balance at three levels Body calming the nervous system and protecting sleep Mind retraining attention and reducing rumination Life rebuilding independence boundaries connection and meaning Growing up rewired does not have to mean growing up broken This book is for parents educators counselors and anyone who wants to understand why childhood feels harder today and how to help young people build real resilience in a distracted high pressure world Calm can be rebuilt Confidence can be trained Childhood can be made more humane again
