Optimizing Road Safety Inspections on Rural Roads

Abstract: Road safety depends on a complex balance between all the factors that compose the road system: user, vehicle, environment, and infrastructure. Directive 2008/96/EC introduces procedures to improve the European Transport Network (TEN-T) safety, recognizing an important role for safety inspections, but focusing them on freeways and highways. This paper proposed methods and criteria useful to optimize current inspection procedures and adapt them also to secondary and local rural roads. It is often complex to determine the severity and weight of the different risk factors in this context, since deficiencies and faults can be found both in the road infrastructure and in the other components of the system. The proposed survey method was applied to a stretch of the SS7 Appia state road (Lazio, Italy). Producing video capture and using GPS sensors to geolocalize the data proved to be very useful for the compilation of the survey forms. The results showed a good consistency between the safety assessments obtained from the scoring of the inspection forms and the historical accident rate. Therefore, the proposed methodology can be a valuable aid in understanding safety concerns and in defining the improvement actions.

1. Introduction

Road safety is a complex balance between the different components of the road system: user, vehicle, environment, and infrastructure. The resulting interaction can be termed “dynamic,” since the user learns and processes information from outside at each instant and adjusts his or her driving behavior accordingly. Potential issues in the road system can disrupt the balance and reduce the safety margin that ensures the proper functioning of the system. Risk, in fact, can be caused by defects or deficiencies of the road infrastructure.

In Europe, the “road infrastructure safety management” has been codified in Directive 2008/96/EC [1], transposed in Italy into the Legislative Decree 35/2011 [2], and in subsequent amendments and additions (Legislative Decree 213/2021 [3]). Initially, the scope of the decree fell (Art.1, par.2) within the roads of the Trans-European Transport Network (TEN-T). To date, with the introduction of the Legislative Decree 213/2021 (transposition of the Directive 2019/1936/EC [4]), the standard is extended to other roads, with certain characteristics, and road infrastructure projects in rural areas. From 1 January 2025, the methodology will also be applied to the road network of national interest.

Recent regulations pursue the primary objective of assessing the safety of open roads to vehicular traffic through preventive analysis. Thus, investigations aim to preliminarily identify the technical, geometric, and functional characteristics of the road that may result in an accident [5] (“diagnosis phase”) and subsequently identify the best strategies for mitigating or eliminating critical issues (“treatment phase”). This goal can be pursued in several ways.

Nowadays, the most implemented strategy involves in-situ inspections for an immediate reading of risk situations for traffic. Indeed, over the years, several research projects have tried to provide efficient guidelines for road inspections, among which is the
