Papillomavirus Type 16 E7 in Human Papillomavirus-associated Carcinogenesis ,2012 Persistent infections by high risk Human Papillomavirus HPV types are associated with nearly all cervical cancer a large majority of other anogenital cancers and a growing subset of head and neck cancers Of these high risk HPVs HPV type 16 HPV 16 is the genotype most commonly associated with these cancers HPV 16 encodes three oncogene E5 E6 and E7 that are largely responsible for HPV associated malignancies In HPV transgenic mice HPV 16 E7 functions as the predominant oncogene in the context of cervical as well as head neck cancers However the molecular mechanisms by which E7 causes cancers in these organs has remained undefined HPV 16 E7 protein can interact with over 100 cellular proteins Among these cellular factors it is best known for its ability to bind to the tumor suppressor pRb and its related pocket proteins p107 and p130 Prior studies using genetically engineered mice demonstrated that inactivation of pRb alone is not sufficient to recapitulate the oncogenic properties of E7 in both cervical and head neck carcinogenesis Based on these findings the focus of my thesis was to identify other cellular factors that are important targets of E7 in causing cancers of the cervix and head neck region To perform my studies I made use of mouse models for HPV associated cervical and head neck cancers previously established in the Lambert laboratory In the context of head neck cancer studies I learned that combinatorial loss of pRb and p107 led to high susceptibility to head and neck cancer and are therefore highly relevant E7 targets In cervical cancer studies I made two important observations First p21Cip1 functions as a tumor suppressor in cervical carcinogenesis and its inactivation by HPV 16 E7 partially contributes to E7 s oncogenic properties in the cervix Secondly in contrast to what I observed in the head neck region combinatorial loss of two or even all three pocket proteins was not sufficient to induce cervical cancer though it did lead to the development of high grade dysplasia in the female reproductive tract These findings provide evidence for a role of targets other than the pocket proteins and the p21 in mediating E7 s oncogenic properties in cervical cancer Case Files
