

Lab 11. Ecosystems and Biodiversity: How Does Food Web Complexity Affect the Biodiversity of an Ecosystem?

Introduction

An ecosystem is a community of living organisms and the nonliving components of the environment. Energy flows in an ecosystem in one direction through food chains, and a food web is made up of all the food chains within a community of organisms. Food chains and food webs consist of the producers (the autotrophs of an ecosystem), the primary consumers (the herbivores and omnivores of the ecosystem), the secondary consumers (the carnivores and omnivores of the ecosystem), and the top predator. Some ecosystems have complex food webs and some do not. In ecosystems with a complex food web, herbivores and omnivores eat many different types of plants and the carnivores eat many different types of animals. The consumers in this type of ecosystem are described as generalists. Ecosystems that support consumers that rely on a single food source, in contrast, have simple food webs, because the consumers are specialists. An example of a complex food web is provided in panel (a) of the figure below, and an example of a simple food web is provided in panel (b) of that figure.

Example of (a) a complex food web and (b) a simple food web

Biodiversity refers to the variation in species found within an ecosystem, and it is measured in two ways: (1) species richness, which is the total number of different species in an ecosystem; and (2) relative abundance, which is a measure of how common each species is within the ecosystem. Regions that are home to many different species with a high relative abundance of those different species have high levels of biodiversity, whereas regions with only a few different types of species or that have moderate species richness but a low relative abundance of several species have a low level of biodiversity.

Notice that the food webs illustrated on the opposite page have the same amount of species richness even though the feeding relationships are different. Some of the feeding relationships illustrated in these two ecosystems, however, may or may not be sustainable over time and may result in a net decrease in biodiversity. The relative abundance of each species, for example, may change if one or more of the populations within the ecosystem grows or declines over time. The species richness of the ecosystems could also change if some of the populations disappear because of too much predation or too little access to natural resources. Given the role that biodiversity plays in ecosystem health and tolerance to ecological disturbances, it is important to understand how food web complexity is related to the biodiversity of an ecosystem.

Your Task

Use the online simulation Ecology Lab (see the figure on the next page), to explore the relationship between food web complexity and biodiversity in an ecosystem.

The guiding question of this investigation is, How does food web complexity affect the biodiversity of an ecosystem?

Materials

You will use an online simulation called Ecology Lab to conduct your investigation. You can access the simulation by going to the following website: www.learner.org/courses/evrsci/interactives/ecology/.
