

WRITING LITERARY ARGUMENTS

Most of the research writing about literature you encounter in school is persuasive in genre and purpose. Sometimes, that research can help determine the topic of your literary argument. Other times, you'll choose a topic on your own and use research to help you write your argument. Either way, you will need to identify a debatable topic that is, one that a person could reasonably hope to persuade to change their mind about. The more debatable the topic, the more persuasive your argument will be. Conversely, your topic and your goal will be easier.

When you write a literary argument, you follow the same process you'd follow any other persuasive genre aimed at human beings. However, because the purpose of an argument is to persuade readers, you'll focus more on identifying arguments to present and rebut.

Planning a Literary Argument

Choosing a Debatable Topic

Arguments are persuasive only when people disagree, especially a person's choice about the topic involved. Thus, first you will find a debatable topic about which you will write. Then, second, you will determine what you'd like to argue about the topic. In other words, a debatable topic can mean what a person could hope to persuade to change their mind about. — Merriam-Webster

- Topic Statement: Shakespeare's Hamlet is a political statement, demonstrating that all the violence that exists in the world is justified.
- Debatable Topic: Should I read or watch a play or film about Shakespeare's Hamlet? I can't decide. In either Hamlet or Othello, he is a murderer, so I can't read or watch either.

An argument about a debatable topic is persuasive because it's something you can disagree with. — Merriam-Webster
