

Chapter 15: Perceptions

True or False

- The perceptual process begins with the sensation of light entering the eye through the cornea, with the rods.
- The tendency to focus on one dimension of reality is known as perceptual set. All things are perceived in terms of expectations through selective attention. One example of this is the tendency to hear words that are related to the current situation.
- The tendency of people to perceive the other person as related to an object is called the halo effect.
- According to the Gestalt school of psychology, we perceive objects as wholes of sensations and as groups. This tendency can be illustrated using a figure called a "Müller-Lyer" illusion.
- The tendency to perceive complete forms despite sensory ambiguity is called perceptual closure. Processing of stimuli as well as top-down processing are involved. Expectations and assumptions are involved and sometimes they cause us to perceive and process information in ways that are not intended. When we view a crowd, we see the overall shape as a figure as distinct from individual stimuli in the crowd.
- Identify the major contributions of Gestalt psychology to the understanding of perception, how perception sometimes occurs, generally, through bottom-up processing of stimuli, and how often processing top-down factors and expectations, like those people, can use figures, context, objects, or stimuli from surrounding stimuli, present. We recognize these stimuli and a whole by organizing them into groups of processing, perceptual, cognitive, motor, and affective.
- Perceiving, analyzing, abstract, individual, and combinations are examples of Gestalt rules of grouping.
- The principle that an object is seen as a whole, sometimes perceived as a whole. The principle that we try to get a sense of a complete, whole object in a scene. The grouping of items that are close to each other in the principle of proximity. The grouping of items that look alike in the principle of similarity. The tendency to perceive patterns or structured items as a single unit in the principle of connectedness.
- The ability to see objects in their dimensions despite their two-dimensional representation. An object is called a depth percept.
- Children and adults developed the same visual skills to see depth perception in infancy.
- Summarize the results of Gibson and Slobin's studies of depth perception.
- Do the size and speed of motion, or the perceived distance, or other factors, affect perception?

Now questions (2) (usually the depth perception question is difficult)
