

Special Senses - Vision

Normally, sensory information is transmitted as a message-carrying action from body and external-sensory structures. When triggered, these receptors send nerve impulses along afferent pathways to the brain for interpretation. Thus, these specializations of the nervous system allow the body to sense and adjust to changing conditions in the environment very sensitively.

Five basic categories of general sensation that occur across the organism are: temperature changes, and mechanical—pressure, vibration, touch, etc. In contrast, the receptors of the special senses—light, hearing, equilibrium, taste/smell—operate exclusively, and directly, on their own specific receptors.

Eye and Vision

It captures the light rays (emitted by the object) through the eye's optical system to the optic nerve fibers.

It focuses the light rays on the sensitive retina (located on an inner eye structure) as an image.

The sensitive exposed surface (innermost) of the retina, which has a light-sensitive layer of rods and cones, converts the light rays into nerve impulses. The rods are all-seeing cells (retinal cells) that help to identify the general environment (shape and brightness) of an object. The cones, part of the retina, are called cones.

Intensity levels of the eye's sensitive surface is further tuned by the iris and lens. Light rays enter at different angles. Thus, in the absence of lens, different light rays penetrate differently and it results:
