

GEOPHYSICAL METHODS OF EXPLORATION

CORE DRILLING

Core drilling can be considered both a geological and geophysical technique and can be used to determine the true vertical orientation of a horizon. The information and accuracy of the results are the foundation of seismic. Core drilling also provides the location of structural trap potential. Core drills are used frequently to measure aquifer thickness where the existing data is sparse (needed to correct downward time to depth). The two locations are determined and corrected by comparison and adjustment to measured geophysical (seismic) and geologic (structural) trends. Seismic measurements are the most significant and costly methods employed throughout exploration since they are usually every decade.

SEISMIC

Seismic techniques have recently had a renaissance because of the growing use of seismic data in the oil and gas industry. Seismic data is used to determine the location of structural traps and to measure aquifer thickness where the existing data is sparse (needed to correct downward time to depth). The two locations are determined and corrected by comparison and adjustment to measured geophysical (seismic) and geologic (structural) trends. Seismic measurements are the most significant and costly methods employed throughout exploration since they are usually every decade.

MAGNETIC TECHNIQUES

The magnetic method of geophysical exploration is used to determine the location of structural traps and to measure aquifer thickness where the existing data is sparse (needed to correct downward time to depth). The two locations are determined and corrected by comparison and adjustment to measured geophysical (seismic) and geologic (structural) trends. Seismic measurements are the most significant and costly methods employed throughout exploration since they are usually every decade.

ELECTRICAL TECHNIQUES

Electrical methods of geophysical exploration are used to determine the location of structural traps and to measure aquifer thickness where the existing data is sparse (needed to correct downward time to depth). The two locations are determined and corrected by comparison and adjustment to measured geophysical (seismic) and geologic (structural) trends. Seismic measurements are the most significant and costly methods employed throughout exploration since they are usually every decade.

REMOTE SENSING

Remote sensing satellite methods are used to determine the location of structural traps and to measure aquifer thickness where the existing data is sparse (needed to correct downward time to depth). The two locations are determined and corrected by comparison and adjustment to measured geophysical (seismic) and geologic (structural) trends. Seismic measurements are the most significant and costly methods employed throughout exploration since they are usually every decade.

CONCLUSIONS
 Geophysical methods are used to determine the location of structural traps and to measure aquifer thickness where the existing data is sparse (needed to correct downward time to depth). The two locations are determined and corrected by comparison and adjustment to measured geophysical (seismic) and geologic (structural) trends. Seismic measurements are the most significant and costly methods employed throughout exploration since they are usually every decade.
