The 'Sugary Drinks Tax'

A 20% tax on sugary drinks in the UK would prevent 3.7 million people becoming obese over the next decade, a report predicts. Cancer Research UK and the UK Health Forum worked out the likely impact of the tax on eating habits and, ultimately, the nation's waistlines. Their report said such a tax would also save the National Health Service (NHS) £10m a year by 2025. The government is considering the measure, but soft drinks companies say other options would be more effective. People get between 12% and 15% of their energy from sugar, but official recommendations say it should be less than 5%.

Statisticians have modelled the impact of the tax and predicted a 16% reduction in the number of cans of pop being consumed. Their figures were then adjusted to account for the food and drink people might turn to instead. They concluded that a tax would lead to people consuming on average 15 fewer calories per day. While the difference sounds tiny, the model predicts a large impact on waistlines. Currently, 29% of people are obese and trends suggest that figure will reach 34% in 2025. Rather than reverse the obesity epidemic, the forecast predicts the tax would lead to obesity rates levelling off at around 29% - preventing 3.7 million people from becoming obese. Alison Cox, from Cancer Research UK, said: The ripple effect of a small tax on sugary drinks is enormous. These numbers make it clear why we need to act now before obesity becomes an even greater problem. And Jane Landon, from the UK Health Forum, argued: Countries which have introduced a tax on sugary drinks have not only reduced consumption, they have raised much-needed revenues for public health measures.

A report by Public Health England said a sugary drinks tax would cut sugar consumption at least in the short term. And TV chef Jamie Oliver has campaigned for the tax saying it was the single most important change that could be made. The director general of the British Soft Drinks Association, Gavin Partington, said: The hypothetical claims made in this modelling study run contrary to real-world evidence. In fact, the soft drinks tax in Mexico has reduced average calorie intake by six calories per person per day, with no evidence that it has reduced levels of obesity. He added that other options such as reducing portion sizes or changing ingredients would be more effective.

There has also been growing concern about the damaging impact of sugar on health from the state of people's teeth to type-2 diabetes and obesity. Sugar has been dubbed "empty calories" because it has no nutritional benefit. Government advisers also recommend no more than 5% of our 'daily calorie consumption' should come from sugar, which is about six or seven teaspoons for an adult. And for children it is slightly less, so to put this in context, a typical can of fizzy drink contains about nine teaspoons of sugar.
