ABSTRACT

The automatic generation of schedules has been in focus of researches for decades. Since small changes in the input have exponential impact on the tested state space, methods based on heuristics and artificial intelligence are the most successful.

In our paper we analysed the opportunities of automatic generation of the academic final exam scheduling, which is a special subtask of schedule generation. We examined the problem with the genetic algorithm approach. We created a point system, wherewith the goodness of the generated schedules is measurable and comparable. We analysed the effect on achievable results caused by the different changes on our algorithm. We evaluated the algorithms on a real test set of 100 students.

Our results show that for this complexity there is an acceptable solution, and with some improvements on our algorithm we will be able to give solutions, which are better and fairer, than the manually compiled schedules.

INTRODUCTION

Final examination takes place at the end of the degree course in most universities. One current form of this is the oral examination, where at one time in one room only one student takes the exam in front of a board of examiners. All of these instructors have a special role, and only some particular people can fill in these places.

The scheduling of the final exams may be done manually, but the non-automated process can cause human errors, and it is hard to see through the whole scheduling, whether all requirements are realized and the timing is appropriate for everyone.

The complexity of this problem can be approached on two levels. The scheduling problem in itself is NP-complete [1], as there are too many possible combinations for scheduling people. In addition, many final-exam specific conditions must be satisfied during the scheduling and some of them contradict each other easily. For example, we may want to distribute the load among the examiners equally, but to perform certain tasks, such as filling the position of the president or examination from some subjects, only certain academics are suitable. Some teachers may have much more students than others, and it is also possible that not every necessary instructor is available at the same time.
